

Mental health and older adults

Many people think of the older years as a simpler, easier time of life. And there are surely many pleasures to enjoy. Older adults may have the joys of grandchildren, travel, taking up new hobbies and a more relaxed pace.

However, older people can also face hardships. And these can impact their emotional and mental well-being. For example:

- They might suffer losses of loved ones.
- They may retire and lose both income and identity.
- Many have to leave their lifelong homes.
- They may misuse alcohol or other substances to escape difficult feelings.

They can develop illnesses that require them to take several medications. Some of these illnesses can cause physical and mental changes. The same goes for the medications. It can be hard to tell if an older person's symptoms are from illness, medication or emotional problems.

Older peoples' mental health needs

In a society that places so much importance on youth, change and novelty, older adults can feel irrelevant. Yet they still often have much to contribute.

The EAP is administered by Resources For Living, LLC.

All EAP calls are confidential, except as required by law. Information is not a substitute for diagnosis or treatment by a professional. Contact a professional with any questions about specific needs. EAP instructors, educators and participating providers are independent contractors and are not agents of Resources For Living. Provider participation may change without notice.

Older adults can find ways to feel productive, needed and important. For instance, they can mentor, teach and explore other outlets to share their lifetime experience.

Caring for yourself and the older people in your life

Aging has its challenges. As we and our loved ones grow older, mental health needs special attention since it impacts overall wellness.

May is Mental Health Awareness Month, so now's a good time to get informed and be proactive. For more reading and information, visit the National Institute of Mental Health.